ARINAITWE Kenneth

Organic pollutants in the atmospheric and aquatic environments of Lake Victoria

Arinaitwe Kenneth measured organic pollutants, mainly, polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons, polychlorinated biphenyls, brominated and alternative flame retardants and pesticides in Lake Victoria's atmospheric environment. He also investigated the contribution of atmospheric deposition to the historical loading of persistent organic pollutants into Lake Victoria and Lakes Mahoma and Bujuku from the Rwenzori Mountains. His study highlights the risk of exposure of Lake Victoria and surrounding communities to these chemicals. It also highlights the air quality problem resulting from uncontrolled open burning of garbage, poor methods of recycling electronic waste, incomplete fuel combustion, inadequate regulation of agrochemical use and trans-boundary movement of chemical contaminants in the East African Region. The results underscore the need for a deliberate integrated regional mechanism for reduction of chemical emissions and consistent environmental monitoring in order to protect human health. This study provides the largest temporal datasets in Africa, to-date, on atmospheric measurements of the pollutants investigated. This study was supervised by Prof. Bernard T. Kiremire (R.I.P) and Prof. Derek C. G. Muir, and was funded by Makerere-Sida Bilateral Research Programme, International Foundation for Science (IFS) and the Organisation for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons (OPCW).

Nutri-medicinal plants used in the management of HIV/AIDS opportunistic infections in western Uganda: documentation, phytochemistry and bioactivity evaluation

Savina Asiimwe researched on nutri-medicinal plants used in the management of opportunistic infections associated with HIV/AIDS in the western region of Uganda. This study was motivated by the fact that opportunistic infections such as tuberculosis, meningitis, are the main leading causes of mortality among HIV/AIDS patients. The main goal of the research was to document and validate the efficacy of selected plants by conducting ethnopharmacological screening. Her work resulted in the discovery of plant species that are important as immunity boosters and can also curb down cryptococcal meningitis, and other bacterial and fungal infections in HIV/AIDS patients. The study was geared towards improving the quality of herbal medicines, which would in turn improve the quality of health, nutritional status and economic empowerment of the people involved in the conservation, collection, preparation and administration of these plant products. This is to add value to African nutri-medicinal plants that are immune boosters in a form of nutrition, pharmaceutical and cosmetic in nature; as medicine works in form of stimulation, suppression or irritation. This knowledge will aid in developing user-friendly therapies for people who have difficulties with accessing modern medicines. This study was supervised by Assoc Prof. Maud Kamatenesi Mugisha, Dr Agnes Namutebi and Prof Anna Karin Borg Karlson. Funding was provided under Makerere-Sida. Bilateral Research Programme.

Spatial-Temporal Mosquito activity, Composition, Population Genetic diversity and Differentiation in Zika Forest and Kitale, Uganda

Understanding the behaviour, ecology and genetics of mosquitoes allows for effective development of vector-based control methods. Studies on mosquito composition, distribution and activity patterns, population genetics and differentiation in Zika Forest and Kitale village were conducted. A total of 163,790 adult mosquitoes in 13 genera and 60 species were collected, with the genus Coquillettidia presenting the highest proportion, Aedes species collections from the tower, and Anopheles species at the forest edge. Thirty mosquito species were constant in distribution. Fifteen species presented densities above one and 46 less than one. Mosquito blood-meal source analyses revealed a high proportion of human-derived blood meals even from Anopheles species and Aedes africanus (Theobald). Investigation of Aedes aegypti and Ae. africanus populations showed small differentiation. A small proportion of mosquito gene flow is reported. Abundance of mosquito vectors, with great interaction between human and the animal community within and around Zika and Kitale, suggest that the forest is a potential source of parasites and arboviruses that may affect life around the community and the world at large. Interaction of Aedes populations within the forest and village show links between the two, thus may facilitate transmission of pathogens if the right conditions arise.

Modelling Hepatotoxicity and Antiretroviral Therapeutic effect in HIV Monoinfection and Coinfection with HBV

Liver disease is now the leading cause of morbidity and mortality amongst individuals infected with human immunodeficiency virus (HIV). This research has attributed this to the fact that HIV does not only infect immune cells such as CD4+ cells but it also infects liver cells known as hepatocytes. Hepatocytes however, are the cells responsible for metabolising all foreign substances including antiretroviral drugs commonly known as ARVs. ARVs have improved on the long-term outlook of people infected with HIV but unfortunately the drugs are all toxic. When hepatocytes metabolise the toxic ARVs they get injured and hence, weakening the wellbeing of the liver organ (hepatotoxicity). The situation of the liver is worsened when one is infected with hepatitis, a virus that infects hepatocytes. Hepatitis B virus (HBV) is the most common type virus that is 100 times more infectious than HIV and 10% of HIV infected people are coinfecting with HBV. HIV/HBV coinfecting people who are taking ARVs have the liver in triple distress, since their hepatocytes die due to both viruses as well as toxic drug metabolism. However, ARVs are not equally toxic, the toxicities vary from one drug to another, thus, it is possible to identify a therapy that is not too toxic but relatively effective in controlling viral load in the body. This study has used mathematical models and numerical simulations to; establish that liver damage occurs in HIV monoinfection prior to initiation of ARVs; identify the most effective therapy in HIV monoinfection, establish the most toxic drug combinations in HIV monoinfection, identify the optimal combination of drugs in HIV/HBV coinfection that balances effectiveness and toxicity.

SSENKU Edirisa Jamilu

Phytoremediation of acid mine waste polluted and degraded habitats in Kasese District by selected tree species

The current traditional technologies for restoration of mine waste polluted and degraded ecosystems which are generally not feasible or effective on a large scale due to high costs, has rendered the search for new inexpensive green technologies paramount. Thus, Dr. Ssenku E. Jamilu designed and evaluated phytoremediation technique as an alternative for restoration of copper mine-waste polluted and degraded ecosystems in Kilembe and Queen Elizabeth Conservation Area. He used selected tree species of Leucaena leucocephala, Sesuvium portulacastrum and Eucalyptus grandis in conjunction with limestone and compost to reduce the heavy metal contents of the polluted soils through phytoextraction. The study therefore provides effective and inexpensive phytostabilization techniques that can be applied to restore the copper mine-waste degraded ecosystems in Kasese District. This can help to control the enduring heavy metal pollution problem since closure of the copper mines in 1982, improve the unsightly nature of the affected areas and to alleviate the health risks posed by the heavy metals to humans and wild animals. The study was funded by SIDA and supervised by Prof. Hannington Oryem-Origa and Dr. Ntale Muhamad (Ass. Prof.) in collaboration with Prof. Ingvar Backeus and Prof. Kari Lehtila from Sweden.

AKANKWASAH Barirega

Potential for commercialisation of selected underutilised plants for livelihood enhancement in Uganda

Mr. Akankwasah's research focused on analysis of market chains of Cape gooseberry (Physalis peruviana L.), Luffa (Luffa cylindrica (L.) M. Roem) and Tree tomato (Cyphomandra bitorata (Cav.) Sendtn) for commercial viability in Uganda. Underutilised plants in trade were prioritized according to their respective commercialisation potential and market chain analysis and mapping conducted for the top three ranked species. Demand, Supply and economic potential of Cape gooseberries, luffa and tree tomato were assessed. A total of 46 underutilised plant species belonging to 29 families were on the markets in Kampala. Demand for Cape gooseberry and tree tomato was high while that of luffa was low. Market supply for Cape Gooseberries and tree tomato was low compared to available demand while that of luffa was in excess of available demand. Production of Cape gooseberry, tree tomato and luffa were found profitable with farmers marketing margins of 89%, 69% and 30% respectively. Potential strategies for improvement of market chains of the three species and commercialization of underutilized plants in Uganda were suggested. This study was supervised by Prof. John R.S. Tabuti and Prof. Dr. ir. Patrick Van Damme. Funding of the study was made possible by generous financial support of German Academic Exchange Service (DAAD).

Population Structure, Phenology and Fruit Yield of Vitellaria paradoxa C.F. Gaertn. and Woody Species Diversity in the Vitellaria (Butyrospermum) Savanna of Uganda

He investigated the influence of land management practices and environmental factors on diversity of woody plants in Shea butter tree (Butyrospermum) savanna of Uganda. He assessed the population, phenology and fruit yield of Shea butter tree (Vitellaria paradoxa) - an economically important tree in this Savanna. Woody plants were more diverse in old fallows than young fallows and current fields. Fruit yield was highest in current fields, increasing with tree size. Land management and climatic/edaphic factors influenced regeneration and phenology of this tree. Practices for maximizing fruit yield of Shea butter tree and protecting savannas for improved livelihoods were generated. The research was supervised by Assoc. Professors John Bosco L. Okullo and Gerald Eilu, and funded by Carnegie Corporation of New York, European Union and German Academic Exchange Service (DAAD).

KAYISO Flugencio

Synthesizing indigenous and scientific knowledge for conservation and co-management of small-scale fisheries in Uganda (Kalangala and Wakiso districts)

Kayiso analyzed the potential for integration of indigenous and scientific knowledge to enhance the conservation and co-management of the indigenous fish species in Lake Victoria. He examined local fishers' knowledge in Kalangala and Wakiso districts on (i) the biology and ecology of five selected indigenous species; (ii) impact of the traditional and modern fishing gears and practices on the fishery; and (iii) the role of ethno-cosmology and traditional belief systems in fisheries conservation. Results revealed that local fishers were more knowledgeable on the extrinsic than intrinsic aspects of the fish species. Further, traditional fishing gears and practices were reported more environmental-sensitive, hence promoting sustainable fishing and fisheries conservation. The study recommended the creation of species-specific local-level conservations schemes under a co-managerial arrangement between local fishers, fisheries managers and scientists. The schemes were considered instrumental in the restoration of indigenous fish species. Supervisors: Dr Pantaleo Mukasa Kasoma, Prof. Jacobs Godfrey Agea and Dr Peter Akoll. Special thanks to the Commonwealth Scholarship and Fellowship Commission for the partial funding under a split-site doctoral programme between Makerere University and the University of Wales Institute, Cardiff, UK.

Destination Image Formation of Places with Difficult Heritage: A case of Uganda

The research investigated how difficult heritage which is characterised by massacres, genocide, wars and conflicts, social discrimination, diseases, poverty and natural disasters at a destination influences destination image formation. A psychometric test was conducted on tourists that visited Uganda between 2012 and 2013 utilising social constructivism and positivist research paradigms. A model presenting the interplay between difficult heritage and image formation was inductively constructed and empirically tested. The study also revealed that Uganda's image as a tourism destination is negative at first awareness with widespread negative symbolism among social groups at tourist source markets. This knowledge will aid in the design of management and marketing strategies for countries that possess difficult heritage. This study was supervised by Professor Tom Baum, University of Strathclyde, Glasgow, United Kingdom and Professor J. B. Nyakaana, Makerere University, Kampala, Uganda. The study was supported by the Swedish International Development Agency under the Makerere-Sida Bilateral Research programme.

NADHOMI Luliro Daniel

Integration of Bio-physical and Socio-economic Drivers for Soil Loss Prediction in a Banana-coffee Cropping Systems in the Lake Victoria Basin of Uganda

Daniel improved the capacity of the available tools for measurement of soil and water lost from cropping systems, especially in the Lake Victoria Basin. Soil erosion accounts for up to 30% reduction in crop yields in Sub-Saharan Africa, yet adoption of management interventions remains dismal. He postulated that lack of consideration of the socio-economic drivers of soil erosion in the traditional models was a major contributor to the inadequacies of the models. He thus developed a RUSLE-based system dynamic model, with the ability to integrate bio-physical and socio-economic factors of soil erosion. The new model's prediction capacity reduced soil loss values from as high as 120 tons ha<sup>-1</sup> year<sup>-1</sup> to approximately 11 tons ha<sup>-1</sup> year<sup>-1</sup>, in a banana-coffee cropping system. He was supervised by Dr. John Stephen Tenywa and Associate Professor Jackson George Majaliwa Mwanjalolo. His research was supported by the Belgium Technical Cooperation (BTC) and Erasmus Mundas Lot 10, Project of the European Union (EU).

Foot-and-mouth disease virus diagnosis and control in Eastern Africa and application of Solid Phase Blocking ELISAs for serotyping cattle FMD outbreaks in Uganda

Namatovu studied the epidemiology of Foot-and-Mouth Disease Viruses in Ugandan cattle responsible for the 2011 to 2013 outbreaks and improved the specificity of the Solid Phase Blocking ELISAs used in diagnosis of this disease. Using serological and virological analyses, serotypes O and re-emergent A and SAT 2 viruses were identified as being responsible for the outbreaks for that period. Results of this study also showed that purifying antigens improve the specificity of ELISAs used in diagnosis of this disease. Farmers suffer production losses, food insecurity, poverty and government lose revenue from embargos on exportation of animals/products due to this disease. The findings contribute to improved disease control including offering advice to policy makers on effective vaccine importation. Dr. Kirsten Tjornehoj, Associate Professor Vincent B. Muwanika and Dr. Chrisostom Ayebazibwe supervised this study, and was funded by DANIDA under the Transboundary Animal Diseases in East Africa (TADEA) project.

NZUVE Felister Mbuta

Breeding for Resistance to Stem Rust in Bread Wheat

Stem rust disease is a major limiting factor in the production of bread wheat in the Eastern African Region. The Ug99 strain of the disease is particularly dangerous, having broken down all known genetic resistance to the disease in commercial wheat varieties in the region. Ms. Nzuve's study sought to find sources of resistance to the Ug99 strain in bread wheat in addition to determining how this resistance is inherited. She also sought to find molecular markers for identifying resistance genes. Her study will facilitate wheat breeders to quickly introduce durable resistance to stem rust into bread wheat, and improve yield of the crop in the region. The study was funded by the Regional Universities' Forum for Capacity Building in Agriculture (RUFORUM) and the International Maize and Wheat Improvement Centre (CIMMYT), and was supervised by Dr. Tusiime Geoffrey and Dr. Sridhar Bhavani.

Clinical Pathology, development and evaluation of alternative diagnostic tests for detection of African swine fever in Uganda

Afayoa Mathias investigated the problem of African swine fever, a devastating disease which kills pigs in large numbers. Mathias has developed an affordable and user-friendly in-house diagnostic kit for detection of African swine fever that does not require expensive laboratory access. This kit can easily be made widely available to veterinarians to help farmers at grass root level. IKWAP Kokas

Epidemiology of enterotoxigenic Escherichia coli and Salmonella diarrhea in piglets and weaners from northern and eastern Uganda

Ikwap's research was to understand the strains of E. coli and salmonellae causing diarrhea in piglets and weaners from northern and eastern Uganda and their control. The salmonellae were highly diverse (20 serovars) and some were highly resistant to drugs commonly used against bacterial infections in humans and livestock in Uganda. However at herd level, the pigs kept in houses with concrete floors, roofs and walls were protected from Salmonella infections compared to free-ranging or semi-intensively managed pigs. Escherichia coli strains were less diverse and carried 2 genes for 2 major surface proteins that can be targeted during vaccinations to control E. coli diarrhea. The research also established the presence of a possible confounder (viral infection) during diagnosis of E. coli diarrhea in piglets and weaners, in northern Uganda. Dr. Kokas Ikwap was supervised by Prof. Joseph Erume, Assoc. Prof. David Okello Owiny, Assoc. Prof. George William Nasinyama from Makerere University and Prof. Magdalena Jacobson and Prof. Claes Fellstrom from Swedish University of Agricultural Sciences. Management practices influencing cow reproductive performance and prevalence of subclinical mastitis in urban and peri-urban dairy production systems

Kanyima's study compared the performance outcomes of dairy cows reared within a 20-km radius of the two urban livelihoods to highlight the influence of a 2-decade post-war socio-political stability variance between the socially stable Kampala and the recently settled Gulu. The study established that socio-economic factors and husbandry practices were critical for the performance of the reproductive function and also the prevalence of subclinical mastitis of dairy cows reared in the urban and peri-urban production systems such as around Kampala and Gulu, Uganda. The study also established that in the urban and peri-urban farming systems of Kampala. Husbandry malpractices did not deter the cows' innate capacity to resume ovarian activity after calving. However, the sustainability of the ovarian function in the majority of cows was sub-optimal or unacceptable for the desirable annual calving goal. In addition, the prevalence of sub-clinical mastitis, noted as very high (86.2%), was mostly spread by milking malpractices on farms and dominantly due to coagulase negative staphylococcal agents bearing antibiotic resistance genes against penicillin drugs. This finding raised public health concern about qualitative aspects of milk produced in the farming systems. This study was co-supervised by Dr Maria Gorretti-Nassuna-Musoke, Assoc. Prof. David Okello Owiny of Makerere University; Assoc. Prof Renee Bage and Prof Ulf Magnusson of Swedish University of Agricultural sciences.

KATO Charles Drago

Co-infections, cytokine profiles and parasite genotypes associated with sleeping sickness in Uganda

Kato's research focused on understanding why some patients with sleeping sickness present with more severe symptoms compared to others. The research showed that malaria was common among sleeping sickness patients but with no influence on sleeping sickness clinical outcome. The research established that some cytokines produced in the brain were protective against severe brain impairment thus making them promising drug candidates for managing sleeping sickness. Furthermore, these cytokines showed a high potential to discriminate between patients in early or late stage of infection making them promising disease stage diagnostic candidates. The research also established that trypanosomes circulating in northern Uganda were less diverse with no role in determining sleeping sickness clinical outcome. This study was supervised by Assoc. Prof. Enock Matovu and Dr. Vincent Pius Alibu. The research was funded by the Wellcome Trust through the African Research Consortium on Ecosystem and Population Health (Afrique One) and partially supported by Consortium for Advanced Research Training in Africa (CARTA), Carnegie NGA grant and Higher Education for Development (HED) through the Capacity building in Integrated Management of Trans-Boundary Animal Diseases and Zoonoses (CIMTRADZ).

KIRUNDA Halid

Epidemiology & Characterization of Influenza A Viruses in Animals in Uganda

In Uganda, poultry keeping has been a very useful enterprise in improving household income and nutrition. However, the poultry industry is threatened by outbreaks of avian influenza. This disease affects both poultry and humans. Results of the current study show that the viruses, which cause avian influenza occur in chickens, ducks, turkeys, pigs and among wild birds that regularly visit lakes and swamps in the country. These viruses occur both in the wet and dry seasons, but mainly in October-December. Slaughter of poultry from open sites, keeping different poultry species together and sharing of poultry equipment, among other poor practices, are still widely used by farmers and traders in Uganda. Due to the poor practices and measures used in poultry farming and trade, the risk of transmission of these viruses between infected and healthy poultry and humans would easily occur if Uganda had an outbreak of avian influenza. Unless farmers and poultry traders change their behaviors and practices, the risk of having outbreaks of avian influenza in poultry and humans exists. This study was supervised by Assoc. Prof. Fred Wabwire-Mangen and Assoc. Prof. Denis K. Byarugaba, and was funded by US Department of Defense's Global Emerging Infections Surveillance and Response System (DoD-GEIS) through Contract No. W81XWH-06-C-0414 extended to Makerere University Walter Reed Project (MUWRP) and Government of Uganda through the National Agricultural Research Organisation (NARO).

MUGIZI Rwabiita Denis

Epidemiology of Brucellosis in Urban and Peri-urban Cattle in Gulu and Soroti towns of Uganda

Mugizi studied the epidemiology of brucellosis in cattle in urban and peri-urban areas of Gulu and Soroti towns of Uganda. Brucellosis causes abortion in cattle and relapsing fever in humans. He found that brucellosis was highly prevalent in cattle in the two towns, and that raw milk from these cattle contained Brucella a causative agent of human brucellosis. The bacterium isolated was similar across the herds and closely resembled that isolated in cattle in Kenya suggesting herd to herd and cross boarder transmission of brucellosis. The Brucella had reduced susceptibility to rifampicin, a drug used in treating human brucellosis. The findings of Mugizi's research suggest a need for restricted animal movements and vaccination against brucellosis in cattle coupled with boiling of raw milk and controlled use of antibiotics to prevent further development of resistance. Mugizi's research was funded by Makerere-Sida Bilateral Research Programme and the Carnegie Corporation of New York, and supervised by Prof. Joseph Erume, Prof. Charles waiswa, Prof. Ulf Magnusson, Ass. Prof. George William Nasinyama and Ass. Prof. Sofia Boqvist.

Optimization of restricted insecticide/acaricide application protocol for tsetse and tick-borne disease control in south-eastern Uganda
In his research, Dennis presents findings to the effect that; restricting pyrethroid insecticides on preferred feeding sites of tsetse and ticks (ears, bellies and legs) of 25% and 50-75% of village cattle herds was sufficient for sleeping sickness (humans) and nagana (cattle) control respectively. This was associated with 80% reduction in the cost of application with collateral benefits on control of Theileria parva; the causative agent of East Coast Fever. These results provide resource poor crop-livestock producers, whose health and livestock production potential are often compromised by these diseases, with future cheap intergraded tsetse and tick-borne disease control options. Dr. Muhanguzi Dennis was co-supervised by Professors Charles Waiswa of Makerere University and Susan Christina Welburn of The University of Edinburgh. The research leading to these results received funding from the European Union's Seventh Framework Program-Integrated Control of Neglected Zoonoses, Carnegie-Makerere University Next Generation of African Academics and Makerere University staff development.

Anthelmintic resistance and evaluation of Tephrosia vogelii, Vernonia amygdalina and Senna occidentalis in treatment of gastrointestinal nematodes in goats in Uganda

Immaculate studied the status of resistance to commonly used anthelmintics (albendazole, levamisole and ivermectin) and conducted pharmacological evaluation of three commonly used plant extracts; Fish poison (Tephrosia vogelii), Stinking weed (Senna occidentalis) and Bitter Leaf (Vernonia amygdalina). Resistance was common: 58% to ivermectin; 52% to levamisole and 38% to albendazole, mainly due to nematode called Haemonchus. She documented forty medicinal plants and seven non-plant practices used by farmers, and male farmers older than 40 years knew more about medicinal herbs. In the laboratory, Stinking Weed followed by Fish Poison and Bitter Leaf were active against nematodes. The same plants were not toxic to rats and mice, which could suggest that they are safe for animal treatment at doses used by farmers. She recommends evaluation of conservation status of documented medicinal plants and further development of FAMACHA field diagnostic tool to reduce frequency of anthelmintic use in goats. This study was supervised by Prof. Rubaire Akiiki, Prof. Deogracious Olila, and Prof. Johan Höglund, and was funded by Makerere-Sida Bilateral Research Programme.

NALUBEGA Rebecca (Ms)

Ethnobotanical and phytopharmacological profiles of Lantana trifolia and Sida cuneifolia used in the management of poultry diseases in Central Uganda

Rebecca established that remedies from Lantana trifolia and Sida cuneifolia are potential alternatives to existing conventional veterinary medicine in the prevention and treatment of common poultry diseases. In Uganda, Lantana trifolia and Sida cuneifolia are locally known as akasekera and akeeyeyo, respectively. Her study was motivated by the need to find indigenous solutions to management of microbial and worm infections. She found out that the different aerial parts (fruits, leaves and stem barks) of these plants are considerably effective and safe despite their varying potentials. This will provide a starting point for transformative development and standardization of these poultry herbal remedies. Additionally, these plants are accessible, cheap and readily available and given proven effectiveness and safety, they will be promoted for use by farmers. This work was supervised by Assoc. Improving productivity of Small East African goats using native browse species

Nampanzira researched on how to improve productivity of Small East African goats using native browse species. She determined their nutritive value and how best they can be used as feed for goats. Ficus natalensis and Harrisonia abyssinica were found to have adequate nutritive value to sustain goat production. When tethered goats were supplemented with Ficus natalensis and Harrisonia abyssinica, their meat yield increased by over 60% without negatively affecting the meat quality. These browse species can therefore be used as protein supplements in low-input feeding systems. This knowledge will be used for better and efficient utilization of Ficus natalensis and Harrisonia abyssinica and it will also be used in planning of appropriate goat feeding strategies based on these browse species. This work was supervised by Prof. J.D. Kabasa and Prof. J.R.S. Tabuti. #### Socio-economic Impact of African Swine Fever on Smallholder Pig Farmers Along the Uganda-Kenya Border

Dr. Nantima assessed the social and economic impact of African Swine Fever (ASF) on smallholder pig farmers' livelihoods along Kenya-Uganda border in the districts of Tororo and Busia (Uganda) and Busia and Teso (Kenya). The study found that pig production was a profitable venture that generated a profit of approximately USD 197.85 per annum per household and that ASF had a potential of causing losses of up to USD 190.6 per household per annum. Most households felt impact due to indirect effects due to psychological fear, closure of pig markets, pigs sold early, no pigs to restock and additional costs. The impact was much more felt among the poorest households whose major source of income was from pigs. The level of awareness of biosecurity practices amongst smallholder pig farmers was very low although the majority had good theoretical knowledge of ASF. There were institutional and policy inadequacies in controlling ASF in both countries, therefore there is need for an appropriate policy and strategy to control ASF in Uganda and Kenya. This study was supervised by Professors Michael Ocaido and Anthony Mugisha. The research work was carried out under the ASF Epidemiology project funded by Australian Aid-Commonwealth Scientific and Industrial Research Organization-Bioscience for East and Central Africa-International Livestock Research Institute platform.

KUNGU Joseph Morison

Epidemiology of Taenia solium cysticercosis in the pig value chain in Uganda.

Taenia solium cysticercosis is a public health concern, which also poses a market barrier to smallholder pig producers. It affects pigs and humans in different forms thus lowering economic productivity significantly in pigs and serious health defects in humans. A study was conducted in Kamuli, Mukono, Masaka and Kampala districts of Uganda to extensively assess the risk and burden of the disease in the pig value chain, and identify options for risk mitigation. A series of cross-sectional studies in these districts revealed a true prevalence of 15.8% in pigs. The level of the disease was lower in rural than in urban areas. T. solium cysticercosis was highly associated with exotic and crossbred pigs. Pigs from households that practiced use of water from unprotected sources, drinking of unboiled water and absence of latrine facilities for people with special needs were significantly associated with the disease. Most farmers in Masaka, Mukono and Kamuli districts were aware of the disease in humans but could not link it with the occurrence of infection or disease in pigs thus making eradication of the disease difficult. The possible key players in the maintenance of the Taeniosis-T. solium cysticercosis complex are tapeworm carriers among pork handlers at retail outlets and slaughter of pork from un-gazetted places. This study provides important information that can be used in the control of T. solium cysticercosis along the smallholder pig value chain, and also provides leads to further research options for sustainable disease control. This study was supervised by Assoc. Prof. Francis Ejobi, Dr. Michel Mainack Dione, and Prof. Michael Ocaido, and funded by DAAD and ILRI.

Evaluation of process procedures of selected medicinal plants used for treating malaria fevers in Tororo district

John Odda explored whether the selected antimalarial herbs from Tororo are processed according to the WHO guidelines and sought to determine what happens to active principles when standard processing procedures (SPP) are not followed. The study involved both survey and experimental studies. Tororo herbalists did not know the WHO SPP. However, their extracts had similar levels of marker compounds, efficacy, shelf life and acceptable microbiological load. Furthermore, the in vivo antimalarial evaluation of Ugandan Phyllanthus amarus shoot on Plasmodium berghei trophozoites showed positive activity against the parasites. This study also showed that unpreserved Phyllanthus amarus shoot and Plumbago zeyheri herbal root powders were stable and preclinically safe at 25±50 C for six months. The findings from this study concur with the traditional practices of the local communities in Tororo regarding these herbs for malaria treatment. This study was supervised by Professors Celestino Obua and Paul Waako and funded by Carnegie Cooperation of New York in cooperation with Makerere University, Kampala.

Elephant population ecology and conflict dynamics in Nimule National Park landscape

Bojoi's study focused on determination of abundance, distribution in space and time and impact on human livelihoods in the Nimule National Park landscape (Adjumani district, Uganda and Magwi area, Sudan) by savannah elephant. Direct observations, satellite tracking and household surveys, data logs and rapid field assessments were done. Throughout the dry season, elephants stayed in the park close to the river Nile (riverine vegetation) below Fulla falls. During rainy season the elephants moved out the park, with a big home range in Adjumani district, Uganda. Outside the park, elephants foraged mainly at night and moved faster. Human-elephant conflicts were widespread and were expected to intensify as the elephant's population increases. Transboundary management approach involving local communities between South Sudan and Uganda should be promoted. This study was supervised by Prof. Michael Ocaido and Prof Christine Dranzoa, and funded by Norwegian Government through NUCOOP program.

Sustainable Pozzolana Mining in Uganda

Eunice's study focused on the mining processes, the law governing mining and the mining strategies to enforce the law for Pozzolana mining in Uganda. The study was motivated by a desire to ensure possible regeneration of Pozzolana post mines in order to boost the nation's cement manufacturing industry. Eunice discovered that the tools and methods currently used for Pozzolana mining are unfit. The mining law though adequate, the strategies to enforce it are lacking leading to low levels of adherence. A computer-simulated model to monitor mining activities was formulated. This study was supervised by Assoc. Prof. A.G. Kerali and Dr. Dan Tindiwensi. It was funded by the Millennium Science Initiative through the National Council for Science and Technology.

NATURINDA Dans Nshekanabo

Investigation of the Performance of Pozzolan-Lime Cement for Low-Cost Housing Construction in Uganda

Dans investigated the performance of natural pozzolans mixed with lime as a potential substitute to Portland cement in low strength construction applications. Through experimentation he discovered that compressive strength of pozzolan-lime cement was inversely proportional to pozzolan particle size, but increased with pozzolan content up to a certain point beyond which it starts to reduce. He demonstrated that the effect of pozzolan particle size on compressive strength depended on pozzolan content at which it occurred, and vice versa. His models predicted that peak compressive strength is attained when pozzolan content is between 54% and 60%, and particle size not exceeding 125  $\mu\text{m}$ . The strength achieved was adequate for many low-strength applications like plasters, mortars, mass concrete, bricks, and soil stabilization. These applications are predominant in small housing structures. The findings can help to significantly reduce construction costs of such units, enabling majority low-income groups better access to adequate housing. Acknowledgements to the supervisors and doctoral committee members: Assoc. Prof. Anthony G. Kerali, Dr Dan Tindiwensi, Prof. Barnabas Nawangwe, Assoc. Prof. Umaru Bagampadde and Dr Moses M. Odongo. The research was funded under the Millennium Science Initiative.

Liberalized Agricultural Extension Services: Implications for Gender Relations, farmer agency and Livelihoods in Central Uganda

Catherine Anena's study assessed the effects of liberalized agricultural extension services on gender relations, farmer agency, and livelihoods sustainability of farm households in Central Uganda. The study contends that the design, implementation modalities, structures and processes through which these programmes function impact greatly on households' efforts to craft sustainable livelihoods. The study concluded that the structures and processes under the NAADs framework are skewed against the interests and needs of the less educated and poorer farmers; do not provide sufficient room for agency expansion and lock out farmers that need these services most, thereby negatively impacting on socio-economic wellbeing and livelihoods sustainability. The findings further indicate that though gender relations are changing, there are still significant gaps between men and women farmers in terms of the key assets bases essential for sustainable livelihoods. The study was supervised by Dr Consolata Kabonesa and Dr. Margareta Espling. Funding was provided by Swedish International Development Agency (Sida) under the Makerere-Sida Bilateral Research Programme.

Creed-conduct Leadership Challenges and Opportunities of Societal Transformation in Bunyoro-Kitara Diocese

Asiimwe employed a qualitative methodology to investigate why Bunyoro-Kitara Diocese had a diminished influence in transforming the key societal domains (governance, media, education, business, celebration industry, religion, and family) despite her transformational mission. Basing the research on the "Transformational Leadership Theory", he found that, though the Diocese was optimally engaged in transforming education, religion, and family, other vital domains were neglected. The sacred-secular dichotomy, inadequate capacity in leadership and discipleship, and a consumptive "caterpillar leadership style" surfaced as key leadership challenges. On the other hand, a willing responsive audience, availability of resources, and an emerging attractive, "butterfly leadership style" surfaced as leadership opportunities. He recommended a "pupa reflective stage" to complete the metamorphosis of leadership in order to accelerate societal transformation. The study was supervised by Prof. Emeritus A.B.T Byaruhanga-Akiiki and Dr. Mbabazi Veneranda. It was funded by Campus Crusade for Christ.

When Coping Becomes Adaptation: Experiences of Persons Living with HIV and AIDS in Masaka district

With the development of Highly Active Antiretroviral Therapy prophylaxis and advanced treatments for opportunistic infections, HIV has become a chronic illness, albeit with no cure. People Living with HIV now have hope and set goals for living healthy lives. In Uganda, most of the studies carried out are descriptive in nature; do not describe the process and stages that PLHIV go through to cope, adapt and find meaning in life in the era of ART. This qualitative study carried out in Kalungu and Kitanda sub-counties of Masaka district, highlights how Persons Living with HIV marshal internal and external resources through the different stages of living with HIV to find meaning in life. Findings indicate a combination of problem-focused and emotion-focused cognitive, behavioural, personality and social resources facilitate coping and adaptation through the different stages of emotional crisis, making the decision to fight, fighting for existing and finding meaning in life. This study was Supervised by Prof. John Patrick Muzaale, Dr. Stella Neema and Dr. Badru Bukenya.

Governance and Development of the East African Community: The Ethical Sustainability Framework

Kanakulya philosophically investigated the sustainable governance of the East African Community using applied ethics tools. He found a divergence between 'Market Inspired Sustainability' and 'Traditional African sustainability' logics; the problematic Colonial Social Darwinism; Colonial Functionalist Approach to governance as roots of the ethical challenges underneath the unsustainability of the East African bloc. He found an inverse relationship between transfer of capabilities from colonizers to natives and the sustainability of post-independence states. Likewise there was a directly proportional relationship between colonial governance style and the economic performance of post-colonial of EAC states. He proposed: i) the Comprehensive Ethical Sustainability framework; and ii) a Regional Basic Structure as probable solutions. Research was advised by Prof. Wamala Edward and Prof. Göran Collste with funding from Sida (Swedish Government) and Makerere University

From Bush to Community of Former Child Rebel Combatants in Northern Uganda: Reconceptualizing Post-Conflict Reintegration

This study revealed a departure from the conventional disarmament, demobilization and reintegration (DDR); a blue print approach used by multinational agencies to a post- conflict reintegration that defined the phenomenon in Northern Uganda. . Within the Northern Uganda context, post-conflict reintegration was reconceptualised to bring the reintegrated Former Child Rebel Combatants (FCRC) and community at the center of the process. The findings reveal a reconceptualization of post-conflict reintegration from a relational perspective and not as an activity. The study was able to locate reciprocal relations of trust as instrumental in post-conflict reintegration. Reciprocal relations of trust are integrative in nature and are at the base of knitting the social fabric of a community and therefore central to post-conflict reintegration. Thus, reciprocal relations of trust need to be used in post conflict reintegration processes of ex-combatants as a fundamental avenue in facilitating sustainable post-conflict reintegration processes and approaches. This study was supervised by Prof Charles Bwana and Dr Anders Nilsson; and funded by the Makerere-Sida Bilateral Research Programme

Everyone's View Counts: Community Dialogue in Collective Interventions to mitigate the adverse effects of HIV and AIDS in Uganda
Saidah's research focused on how community dialogue integrates voices, perspectives, and experiences of local people and external sponsors in collective HIV/AIDS mitigation in Kalangala and Nakasongola Districts. She discovered that community dialogue facilitates mutual identification and sharing of mitigation concerns in both traditional and contemporary spaces. The approach optimises diversity of capacities to lessen the various forms of sufferings because of HIV/AIDS by employing methodologies that promote listening, learning and empathy to empower local people to contribute into the external interveners' agenda. This allows ownership of HIV/AIDS by making it a shared problem among heterogeneous actors. She illustrates the effectiveness of strategies that prioritise use of existing community channels; low cost service delivery and investment in knowledge to ensure sustained collective action, reflected in solidarity, downward accountability, social capital and a feeling that local people's views count. Saidah identifies possible policy guidelines to sustain interactions among collaborates and proposes direction for HIV/AIDS policy reform to apply 'dialogue lenses'. She finally acknowledges the contribution of Belgium Technical Cooperation towards her education. This study was supervised by Prof. John Patrick Muzaale, Prof. James Sengendo and Dr. David Kyadondo.

Rethinking Health Communication to Address Social Contextual Barriers to Malaria Control

Ms. Nakiwala's research explored the contribution of health communication to addressing underlying societal barriers to malaria control in Uganda. There exists a wide range of socio-economic and cultural factors that constrain people's ability to prevent and treat malaria. Malaria can be eradicated when such barriers are removed. The study evaluated if and how communication was being used to stimulate opportunities to negotiate gender inequality, economic challenges, poor and inadequate health care, cultural barriers and policy inadequacies. The findings showed that malaria communication was tagged on highly disempowering, institutionalised and horizontal methods, that did not make it possible for individuals and communities to organise themselves to creatively deal with underlying barriers to malaria prevention and treatment. Nakiwala argues for the need to improve the quality of communication so as to strengthen malaria control action at all levels. She specifically contends that until public health policy and communication initiatives recognise the centrality of audience-driven methods and approaches, especially the importance of mutual dialogue between the various actors, eradication of underlying barriers to malaria control, and by implication malaria, will remain an illusion. Ms. Nakiwala's study was supported by the Swedish International Development Agency (Sida) under the Makerere-Sida Bilateral Research Programme and supervised by Assoc. Prof. Monica Chibita and Assoc. Prof. Leonor Camauer.

Performance of Ateso Oral Narratives

This study investigated how performance space was negotiated between performer, audience and text in performance of Ateso oral narratives. Modern modes of presentations were engulfing the traditional forms with alternative means of communication and entertainments relegate the bonfire story-telling as a relic. Using ethnographic methods, the researcher studied oral performances in eight districts in Uganda and Kenya. The study organised performances and focused group discussions with respondents, recorded narratives, translated the narratives using Mildred Larson's method of semantic equivalence. Space negotiation was analysed using Suzanne Keen's theory of Narrative Empathy for in-depth scrutiny of the forces that existed. The theatrical tension brought out the need to accommodate the polarised interests of performer and audience. The study recommends Ateso oral narratives should be documented and digitized for retention and dissemination. Ateso oral narratives can be used for effective planning and crises management in many issues affecting the Iteso. This study was supervised by Assoc. Prof. Aron Mushengyezi and Assoc. Prof. Dominic Dipio; and funded by Makerere University Directorate of Research and Graduate Training.

Influence of Ethnicity and Civic Education on the Formation of the East African Federation: The Case of Uganda

This study investigated the influence of ethnicity and civic Education on the formation of the East African federation in Uganda; putting emphasis on the Political, Socio-economic unity, and Civic Education. The study revealed that ethnicity has strongly influenced the formation of the East African political, social and economic unity of Ugandans due to their different and contrasting interpretation of cultures, norms, customs and traditions. The study also discovered that the people of Uganda lack adequate knowledge about the prospects of the East African Federation. His study recommended for the establishment of a cultural model federation that is widely open politically, socially and economically to all groups of people in the region. It also recommended that educational curriculum of Uganda gives serious consideration to the allocation of sufficient time for civic education in line with the East African Federation project, and also for the need by government of the republic of Uganda to design programmes that would enable all the people of Uganda to access information so as to clearly conceptualise the prospects of the East African Federation. This study was supervised by Dr. Maurice B. Tamale, and Assoc. Prof. Anthony M. Mugagga, and funded by

Headteachers' Perceptions of the Impact of Civil War on Primary Schooling in Northern Uganda (1986-2007)

Peter Mpiso Ssenkusu investigated the headteachers' perceptions of the impact of civil war on primary schooling in northern Uganda (1986 -2007). The purpose of the study was to critically analyze the impact of the armed conflict in order to understand and appreciate the circumstances that surrounded schools and the coping mechanism that were adopted by the headteachers. Specifically the study was guided by four research questions namely 1). What are the underlying explanations for the 1986—2007 civil conflict in northern Uganda? (2) How did the 1986—2007 conflict impact on the provision of UPE in northern Uganda? (3) What structures supported schools to deal with the challenges posed by the instability in northern Uganda? (4) How did the headteachers cope with managing schooling during the 1986—2007 armed conflict in northern Uganda? The findings revealed that the causes of armed conflict are strongly connected to the failure of the democratization process that has beleaguered the country since colonial times. Secondly, achieving universal education remains an uphill task in an environment where the masses remain marginalized. Thirdly the government of Uganda failed to play the central role in the provision of education as expected. Finally, many schools survived the turbulent times through the application of local and homegrown solutions rather than top-down policies from central government. The study recommends that the development of education will depend on the government willingness to institute democratic governance. Secondly, in addition to education resources, prior understanding of a wide range of local circumstances that surround the learning environment need to be decoded. Thirdly, there is a need to build a strong partnership between government and all the stakeholders up to grassroots level. Finally, both soft skills (phronesis) and hard skills (techné) are equally required in the running of all schools regardless of the existing circumstances. This study was supervised by Assoc. Prof. Mugagga Muwaga and Dr. Ssempala Cornelius. It was sponsored by Staff Development Makerere University, Commonwealth Scholarship scheme and Hope Sharing Family Mityana.

Management and Sustainability of Selected Income Generating Projects of Roman Catholic Religious Congregations in Metropolitan Kampala Archdiocese, Uganda

Tumusiime examined the influence of management on the sustainability of income generating projects established by the Roman Catholic religious congregations of nuns and brothers in Metropolitan Kampala Archdiocese. It was premised on the observation that several projects of the catholic religious congregations have hardly been sustainable. Specifically, the study examined the influence of (a) planning, (b) staffing and (c) control on the sustainability of these projects. Results showed that there was insufficient planning, staffing and ineffective control of the projects of catholic religious congregations. It was concluded that insufficient planning, poor staffing and ineffective control were, to a large extent, responsible for the non-sustainability of the income generating projects of the catholic religious congregations. It was recommended that congregations' top leadership and projects managers should professionalise the management of the projects by ensuring that qualified individuals are employed, motivated and monitored as they run these projects. The study was supervised by professor J.C.S, Musaazi and Dr. B. Ezati.

BARAGEINE Justus Kafunjo

Genital fistula among Ugandan women: risk factors, treatment outcomes, and experiences of patients and spouses

Barageine's research focused on genital fistula with emphasis on risk factors for obstetric fistula, treatment outcomes, and experiences of patients and spouses. Short stature, big baby, prolonged labour and injury by unskilled officers during caesarean section were risk factors for fistula in western Uganda. He also found that early discharge three days after fistula surgery was safe, acceptable and did not increase the risk of complications when compared with routine late discharge after 14 days, with cost reduction implications to patients and hospitals. Qualitatively, affected women were lonely, isolated, stigmatised, depressed, and sexually challenged. The male spouses of women with fistula suffered sexual and financial problems but also felt small within a dominant masculine hegemony. The findings have policy, programmes and practice implications in Uganda and in the global campaign to end fistula. This research was funded by Makerere-Sida Bilateral Programme under The Makerere University and Karolinska Institute Collaboration. Prof. Elisabeth Faxelid, Ass. Prof. JK Byamugisha, Ass. Prof. NM Tumwesigye and Dr. Lars Almroth supervised the work.

Chronic alcohol exposure by HIV-infected patients on antiretroviral drugs regimen (d4T/3TC/NVP) in Uganda: a study of therapeutic window and their therapeutic responses

Bbosa S. Godfrey investigated effects of chronic alcohol use by HIV-infected patients on therapeutic windows of stavudine (d4T), lamivudine (3TC) and nevirapine (NVP) and their treatment outcomes during 9 months of follow up. Ethanol and its metabolites influences epigenetic mechanisms, drug metabolizing enzymes and transporters that may affect the dosed plasma drug concentrations and their half-lives. Most patients in study had normal plasma ranges of NVP while d4T and 3TC plasma levels were higher. Some patients had undetectable d4T and NVP plasma levels despite having adherence rate of  $\geq 95\%$ . Patients with high viral load were observed in alcohol group as compared to controls in both WHO AUDIT tool and alcohol biomarkers groups. Mean CD4+ cell counts were lower and mean AST, ALT and AST/ALT levels were slightly higher in alcohol use group. Mean RBC, Hct, HGB, MCHC, WBC and differential count in both control and chronic alcohol use groups were within normal reference ranges though lower in alcohol group. The work was supervised by Prof. Jasper Ogwal-Okeng, Prof. David B. Kyegombe and Prof. Willy W. Anokbonggo. The work was self-sponsored though International Brain Research Organization (IBRO) and Commonwealth Scholarship Programme provided funds to attend relevant courses.

Strategies for Improved Uptake of Mass Treatment for Schistosomiasis Control among School Children in Uganda

Muhumuza examined the uptake levels of mass treatment for the control of Schistosomiasis (bilharzia) among school children in south-eastern Uganda and evaluated strategies for improved uptake. In his study, he established that uptake of mass treatment with praziquantel was unacceptably low because of the beliefs and attitudes towards schistosomiasis treatment and the fear of side-effects of praziquantel especially when the drug is taken on an empty stomach. In his trial, Dr. Muhumuza revealed that provision of a pre-treatment snack combined with education messages did not only increase uptake of treatment but also significantly reduced the prevalence of infection and the side-effects of the drug.

Barriers of early diagnosis and treatment of cervical cancer in Uganda: Evidence from studies on cervical awareness and pathways to diagnosis and treatment

Mwaka Amos Deogratus investigated factors that contribute to late diagnosis of cervical cancer in northern Uganda. Some of these factors were; communities' potentially harmful perceptions and beliefs about causes of cancers; women's misattributions of cancer symptoms to other common illnesses; perceived challenges to health seeking; and beliefs in superiority of traditional medicines. Dr. Mwaka's research revealed that older women, women who are not married and those from poor background were more likely to be diagnosed in late stage. His work provides valuable data to guide policymakers in developing targeted interventions to promote prompt symptom recognition and care-seeking for cancers. He was supervised by Prof. Henry Wabinga, Dr. Elizeus Rutebemberwa and Dr. Kiguli Juliet. Funding was provided by THRIVE/WELLCOME TRUST.

Asthma and Acute Lower Respiratory Tract Infection in Under-fives in Uganda: Magnitude, Diagnosis and Outcomes

Nantanda examined the burden, diagnosis and outcomes of asthma and acute lower respiratory tract infections among children less than five years of age presenting to Mulago hospital with cough and difficult breathing. She established that almost half of these children have asthma. The majority (95%) of children with asthma were diagnosed as pneumonia. Compared to the children with pneumonia, children with asthma were less likely to die. She also developed a simple tool based on symptoms alone that can be used to screen for asthma in young children. This study provides important information for increasing awareness about childhood asthma among clinicians and policy makers, and also suggests ways of improving on identifying children with asthma. This study was supervised by Prof James K Tumwine and Asso. Prof. Marianne S Ostergaard and funded by .....

The Effect of Plasmodium falciparum and Helminth Coinfections, and Anthelmintic Treatment, on Childhood Malaria

Dr Juliet Ndibazza investigated the association between helminth infections and deworming, and childhood malaria. Her research revealed that helminth infections in pregnancy had a harmful effect on malaria in the offspring; and that regular deworming in childhood may be beneficial for malaria. Her work provides valuable information for malaria control especially in areas where helminths and malaria are co-endemic. This study was supervised by Prof. Alison Elliott and Dr. Birgitte Vennervald, and funding was provided by the Wellcome Trust, and the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation.

Evaluation of New Tests for Improved Diagnosis and Treatment of TB in HIV Patients in Uganda

HIV is the strongest risk factor for developing disease from tuberculosis (TB) in individuals infected with the TB germ. The traditional method for TB diagnosis in Uganda is examination of sputum using a microscope (TB microscopy), a method that misses more than half of patients with TB-especially in those who are HIV-positive. New tests that rely on detection of the DNA of the TB germ or its rapid growth in the laboratory were developed to replace TB microscopy and improve TB diagnosis. This study was to demonstrate the superiority of the new tests over microscopy in regard to diagnostic accuracy, cost-effectiveness, and effect on patient treatment, before they could be adopted in Uganda. The study found that the new tests identified a substantial number of additional TB patients that were missed by microscopy, the tests were cost-effective in the Ugandan setting, and they saved HIV patients from unnecessary TB treatment. From the findings of this study, and together with evidence from other countries, the Uganda National TB Programme has adopted the DNA-based TB test commonly known as GeneXpert and is being scaled-up in all health facilities. There is evidence that use of GeneXpert improves TB care among HIV patients through laboratory confirmed diagnosis of TB before initiation of treatment that lasts 6-8 months. This research was supervised by Prof. Moses Joloba, Dr. Freddie Bwanga, Dr. Achilles Katamba, Dr. Melles Haile, Prof. Ayesha de Costa, and Prof. Sven Hoffner. The research was sponsored by the Makerere-Sida Bilateral Research Programme.

Phenotypes and Microevolution of Mycobacterium tuberculosis Uganda Family

In Uganda, Mycobacterium tuberculosis complex (MTBC) Uganda family "tribe" is responsible for majority (70%) of tuberculosis (TB) cases. Therefore, this study sought to understand why MTB Uganda family is dominant using a well characterized cohort. To accurately identify MTBC, a novel high throughput MTBC genotyping tool was developed for the first time; the assay revealed 3 dominant MTBC genotypes circulating in Uganda for the last 18 years. However, the long-term success of MTB Uganda family is not due to increased virulence or transmission. Furthermore, HIV has no impact on the diversity of MTB Uganda family, BUT HIV/TB co-infected patients' plays minimal role in TB transmission. This study supervised by Prof. Moses L Joloba, Prof. W. Henry Boom, and

Prof. Sebastien Gagneux. The study was funded by The Tuberculosis Research Unit (TBRU), with Federal funds from the United States National Institutes of Allergy and Infectious Diseases & the United States National Institutes of Health and Human Services; and the Carnegie Corporation of New York/ Makerere University Collaboration.

Access to health care for predominantly pastoral communities adjacent to Lake Mburo National Park in Kiruhura District, Uganda: A case of Brucellosis management

Catherine Kansiime investigated access to health care and community perceptions on integrated human and animal services in the management of brucellosis. This was to inform the designing of effective control strategies. Brucellosis being a zoonotic disease (transmitted from animals to humans) of Public health, veterinary, and economic significance, there is need to recognize that animal and human health are closely linked. Therefore, this PhD work revealed a need for improved access to diagnostic and treatment of the disease as well as collaboration between the public health, veterinary and wildlife sectors, communities and related government sectors to provide integrated services in the management of brucellosis.

The work was supervised by Assoc. Prof. Elizeus Rutebemberwa and Prof. Anthony Mugisha and funded by International Development Research Centre (IDRC, Canada).

Safety of Medical Male Circumcision, Virological Response and Wound Healing Among HIV-Infected and Uninfected Circumcised Males in Rakai

Godfrey Kigozi's research assessed the safety of male medical circumcision, virological response and wound healing among HIV infected and uninfected men in Rakai in order to guide programs on provision of safe male medical circumcision to men with low CD4 counts. Safety, as assessed by severe and moderate adverse events rates, and wound healing among HIV-positive men were similar to those among HIV negative men. In addition, medical male circumcision surgery does not increase HIV viral load in the immediate postoperative period as had earlier been hypothesized. The findings indicate that medical male circumcision may be safely rolled out without necessitating pre-surgery CD4 counts determination and worrying about postoperative delayed. This study was supervised by Prof. Fred Wabwire Mangen, Dr. Noah Kiwanuka, Dr. Alex Opiyo. The study was funded by Rakai Health Sciences Program, Fogarty training grant and African doctoral dissertation Research fellowship (ADDRF).

MAZIGO Humphrey Deogratias

Epidemiology of Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV-1) and Schistosoma mansoni co-infection and its Impact on Praziquantel Treatment Outcome Among HIV-1 Infected Individuals in Fishing Communities in Mwanza Region, North-Western Tanzania

Evidence suggests that intestinal schistosomiasis and HIV-1 infections interacts in causing health effects in co-infected individuals, with HIV infection associated with treatment failure of intestinal schistosomiasis efficacy; resulting in negative implication on health. Dr. Mazigo investigated, the co-occurrences of S. mansoni and HIV-1, their immunological interactions, assess the effects of praziquantel on HIV-1 markers (viral loads and CD4+ cells) and the effects of HIV-1 co-infection on praziquantel treatment outcomes among Schistosoma mansoni infected individuals co-infected with HIV-1 or not. The overall results indicate that HIV infection had no effect on development of intestinal schistosomiasis related health consequence, on the effects of anti-schistosomiasis treatment to clear S. mansoni infection and reversibility of hepatosplenic morbidity. Also, the anti-intestinal schistosomiasis treatment had no effect on the level of immunity (measured in terms of the CD4+ levels) and on reduction of the HIV particle levels in blood in infected individuals. These results suggested that the anti-intestinal (praziquantel treatment) schistosomiasis can continue to be used in mass drug administration in areas where co-infection of HIV and intestinal schistosomiasis does occur especially in adult individuals. This study was supervised by Prof. Fred Nuwaha and Prof. David William Dunne. The study was funded by THRiVE/Wellcome Trust, WHO/TDR, Dan Davis Scholarship, Tel Aviv University, Israel and Cambridge-Africa Alborada Research Fund Programme.

A community based intervention to improve the health and survival of low birth weight babies in Iganga/Mayuge Health and Demographic Surveillance Site, Uganda

Dr. Nabiwemba's research focused on identification of low birth weight in the community and improving mother's newborn home care practices. The study aimed to determine an anthropometric surrogate for screening low birth weight in the community and to assess the effect of home visits on newborn home care practices for low birth weight babies. The study revealed that foot length can accurately identify low birth weight and a foot measuring card was developed to be used by community health workers. Pre and postnatal home visits with focused health promotion messages delivered by community health workers led to improved newborn home care practices of mothers and reduced incidence of co-morbidities during the neonatal period. Home visits should be promoted for all mothers in order to save newborns. This study was supervised by Prof. Christopher Garimoi Orach and Prof. Patrick Kolsteren; and funders by the Belgian Directorate-General for Development Cooperation (DGD)

NAKIGOZI Gertrude (Ms)

Non-enrolment in and non-adherence to HIV care in a community-based program, in Rakai, Uganda

Nakigozi's research on non-enrolment in and non-adherence to HIV care in a community-based program, in Rakai, Uganda was based on the ground that improving the outcomes of HIV/AIDS treatment programs in resource-limited settings required successful linkage of HIV infected patients to pre-ART care and retention in pre-ART care until initiation of antiretroviral therapy. The study assessed entry into care of HIV positive persons after receipt of positive HIV results and referral for free HIV services. Barriers to utilization of HIV care were assessed among HIV positives who had never entered into care. She further assessed the impact of patient-selected buddies on HIV disease progression, adherence to clinic appointments and conduct of activities of daily life among HIV positive patients in care, but not yet receiving antiretroviral therapy. In Rakai, nearly a third of newly diagnosed HIV+ persons had not enrolled into HIV care six months after referral into free HIV care services. Being male, young, living alone or having a high CD4 was associated with non-enrolment into care. Stigma, fear of side effects and absence of AIDS symptoms were important barriers to enrolment into care. Care buddies improved conduct of daily life of the HIV infected patients but had no effect on HIV disease progression and clinic appointment adherence. This study suggested a need for interventions to ensure timely linkage into and retention of HIV positive persons in HIV care. The supervisors and doctoral committee are acknowledged for their input and mentorship, and Fogarty and the Africa Doctoral Dissertation fellowship for financial support.

Technical Efficiency and Total Factor Productivity Growth of Selected Public Universities in Africa 2000-2007

Kiwanuka Robert Ngobi examined the relative technical efficiency and total factor productivity growth of 15 African public universities. Three models: general model, teaching-only model and research-only model were estimated. The operating environment was adjusted to ascertain the extent to which it affects the relative efficiency and productivity of the universities. Universities improved in the production of doctorates and peer reviewed articles which were mainly attributed to the improvement of the research technologies rather than efficient use of research inputs. Universities that were large and inefficient in their teaching or research functions should consider reducing their student enrolments or increasing graduation rates and publications to become efficient. Universities that were small and inefficient in their teaching and or research functions should consider scaling up to become efficient. The study was self-sponsored and supervised by Prof. John Ddumba-Ssentamu and Dr. Bruno Lule Yawe.

Determinants of Value and Challenges of Older Persons in Uganda

Nzabona analysed socio-demographic determinants of benefits and challenges of older persons in Uganda. This study went beyond the traditional focus on the problems older persons face to examine the value they offer to society. Four districts were randomly selected and one urban area purposively chosen for the study. Using binary logistic regression model, he established prevalence of engagement in income-generation, possession of indigenous knowledge, leadership of social organisations and advice on behaviour norms. This value of older persons is determined by several factors including age, education, ownership of means of transport, place of residence and land ownership. He further established prevalence of challenges of older persons including loneliness, ill-health and living in dilapidated shelters. These challenges are mainly determined by age, sex, education, marital status, place of residence, TV ownership, social protection status, land ownership and type of fuel used in cooking. Several recommendations are made which include increasing learner access and retention rates in the education system, documenting and harnessing older persons' indigenous knowledge, promoting later-life women leadership, strengthening older persons' advisory role and establishing a special old age fund. Supervisors: Professor James Ntozi and Associate Professor Gideon Rutaremwa. This study was self-funded.

Enhancing Subject access to Local Publications in Selected Universities in East Africa: a comparative study

Ms Nassali's research focused on subject access to local publications at the university of Dar es Salaam and Makerere University in Uganda. As spaces of control, libraries aim at giving users consistent access to information. However, despite the well-intentioned standard, publications outside the Western world are forced to fit under guise of universal standards to the detriment of users who are incognisant of the prescribed language. The Eurocentric nature of the subject headings does not favour local publications and instead hinders access to critical research for national development. Using a qualitative approach, she found out that adherence to cataloguing standards takes precedence over subject access. Librarians rarely focus on the subject heading in the choice of a subject heading while cataloguing. In addition, the terms assigned to local publications are generally too broad and at times border on inappropriate to adequately represent the local publications. The situation is exacerbated by the very old subject headings, lack of documented cataloguing policies and a waning interest in cataloguing matters from the professionals. A model to improve the cataloguing process is proposed. This study was supervised by Prof. Isaac M.N. Kigongo-Bukenya and Assoc. Prof. Constant Okello-Obura; and was funded by the Makerere-Sida Bilateral Research Programme.

MBALASSA Mulongaibalu

Fish Migrations in Lake Edward-Ishasha River Water Systems in Virunga and Queen Elisabeth National Parks. A Case study of Clarias gariepinus (Burchell, 1822): Implications for Conservation"

Mr. Mbalassa Mulongaibalu's research explored fish migrations in Lake Edward - Ishasha Riverwater systems in Virunga and Queen Elisabeth National Parks and it intended to identify migration and spawning grounds, migration periods and extent of Clarias gariepinus. Using mark-recapture method, the research discovered that the lake littoral zone, river mouths and marginal wetlands are spawning grounds and river channels are migration routes. In June-July and December, Clarias migrate downstream from the spawning grounds to the lake. In April-May and August-October, Clarias migrate upstream from the lake to spawn in spawning grounds. Clarias migrate both short and long distances (0.43-51.4 km). The research gives way to best fisheries conservation and management measures. The study was supervised by Prof. Nshombo Muderhwa and Dr. Katayo Mujugu Eliezer of Makerere University. Funding was obtained from Belgian Technical Cooperation, Wildlife Conservation Society, Rufford Small Grants, Columbus Zoo and Ideawild Foundation.

NUWAMANYA Ephraim

Phenotypic and biochemical responses to hydrothermal stress in cassava (Manihot esculenta Crantz) varieties in Uganda

Mr. Nuwamanya studied the biochemical and phenotyping responses of cassava to both water and temperature stress. He found out that cassava varieties can be stress tolerant (stay green) or can be stress avoidant and recover early after removing stress (early recovering). Stress tolerant varieties were characterized by loss of starch and accumulation of sugars, high chlorophyll content and better biomass allocation. Stress avoidant varieties were characterized by early leaf loss on onset of stress and early recovery on offset of stress. This was coupled to reduced starch remobilization and high cyanide contents. Based on this, he selected stress tolerant stay green varieties NASE 3, NASE 2 and Magana while stress avoidant or early recovering varieties were NASE 16, NASE 19 and NASE 14. The study was supervised by Prof. Emeritus: Patrick R. Rubaihayo, Dr. Joseph F. Hawumba and Dr. Yona Baguma.

TURINAWA Alice (Ms)

Enhancement of Sustainable Agricultural Production through Soil and Water Conservation in Uganda

Ms. Alice Turinawe investigated factors that influence adoption and extent of adoption of soil and water conservation technologies, and what the impacts of these technologies have been on farm production and household welfare. The study results revealed that adopting soil and water conservation technologies can improve agricultural production and contribute to lower poverty levels. Rates of adoption need to be enhanced through improving access to extension services and adoption related inputs. Soil and water conservation technology benefits take long to be realized; sustainable adoption is likely, when the recommended conservation packages are given with other agricultural improvement packages that give short term benefits. The study was supervised by Prof. Johnny Mugisha of Makerere University and Prof. Lars Drake of Swedish University of Agricultural Sciences (SLU). Funding was obtained from the Swedish International Development Agency (SIDA) in collaboration with Makerere University.

The Principal, College of Education and External Studies to present the following for the Conferment of the Doctor of Philosophy

KAGGWA Wandira Theopista (Ms)

Teacher Development and Management System Training Programme and the Performance of Head Teachers in the Management of Public Primary Schools in the Greater Masaka Region of Uganda

Ms. Kaggwa investigated the effect of Teacher Development and Management Systems (TDMS) training programme on the performance of head teachers in the management of public primary schools in the Greater Masaka Region of Uganda, emanating from public outcry over the deteriorating standards of primary education in the region. The study revealed that the trained head teachers managed schools better than their untrained counterparts; and the TDMS programme has weaknesses in the curriculum and delivery. Finally, training in institutional leadership and governance, personnel, financial and curriculum management have a positive effect on the performance of head teachers in managing public primary schools. To improve head teachers' performance, it was recommended that the Government should continue to train head teachers, strengthen their training curriculum and make training opportunities accessible to more head teachers. This study was self-sponsored and supervised by Dr. Joseph Kimoga, Dr. Edris, S. Kasenene, Dr. David Onen and Dr. Rovincer Najuma.

Co-ordination, Communication, Total Quality Management and Quality Service Delivery: A Case of Local Governments in Uganda

Mr. Musenze Ibrahim Abaasi examined how Quality Service Delivery in Uganda's Local Governments can be enhanced through co-ordination, communication, and total quality management. Based on a sample of 302 Local Governments, this study established that 48 percent of the total variance in quality service delivery in Uganda's Local Governments is explained by co-ordination, communication, and total quality management. It also found total quality management as an alternative route of communication to quality service delivery and that there is a multiplicative effect of co-ordination and communication on quality service delivery in Uganda's Local Governments. It is recommended that keen attention be placed on co-ordination communication and total quality management for purposes of quality service delivery improvement. The study was sponsored by Belgian Technical Co-operation (BTC) and supervised by Prof. J. C. Munene, Prof. Joseph Ntayi and Prof. Wasswa Balunywa.
